“So do not throw away your confidence; it will be richly rewarded. You need to persevere so that when you have done the will of God you will receive what he has promised” (Heb. 10:35-36).

Can you sense the urgency of his plea? These believers were about to throw in the towel, and it was left to the author to convince them to stay faithful. Maybe these Christians had failed to count the cost, and presumed that a life defined by faith would be easy; or maybe the appeal to the Temple “mega praise” was competing with their small group simple worship. Whatever was driving their decision, they found themselves at a crossroads. The journey was wearing on them. Do they continue or admit defeat by calling it a “run?”

While Scripture is clear about staying faithful to God, defining “faithfulness” can be much more complicated. Such an understanding means trying to read the signs and explain events within our lives. Paul comes to my mind. While he received his calling from God on the road to Damascus, his calling was not always embraced by the church. His ministry was filled with beatings, jail time, and people questioning his own ability if not his own credibility. At any time, he could have rationalized that God wanted him to step aside and let someone else (e.g. younger with more talent) replace him.

With limited perspective, we have a difficult time distinguishing God’s will for our immediate context. Do we stay or go? Which job do we take? What major should we declare? Do we speak or remain silent? Do we open our churches in the midst of a global pandemic or remain only online? Where is the moment when our political ideology infringes on the Kingdom of God, and what do we do about it that line is crossed? When we’re told to stop singing, should we silence our voices or just sing that much louder? What God wants is easier defined in broad terms, what he wants from us right now is often confusing.

George Younce and Glenn Payne of The Cathedral Quartet modeled faithfulness, but it came through the roller-coaster of professional gospel musicians. In the mid-sixties they were the successful worship leaders for Rex Humbard’s Church of the Cathedral with a built-in TV audience. When they went out on their own, they lost their following, struggled to sell concert tickets and records, not to mention making ends meet. With continual turnover in the group, by 1979, George and Glenn finally assembled a group they felt could sing, until a concert promoter convinced the three younger members that George and Glenn did not have their best interest at heart; he misled them to leave and form a new group

How about the Grown-ups?

"Daddy, I want to ask you a question," said little Bobby after his first Sunday school class. "Yes, Bobby, what is it?" "The teacher read the Bible to us. It was about the children of Israel crossing the Red Sea, and the children of Israel making sacrifices. "Didn't the grown-ups do anything?"

Devastated, George and Glenn found themselves at a crossroads. Life on the road had not been easy, their families had suffered, and their record company was threatening to drop them. What should they do? They were tempted to quit; just how many groups actually make it in the music business anyway? But since they were working on their latest album, they saw it to completion. George took Dottie Rambo's classic, "I've Never Been This Homesick Before," and used it to set the tone for the new album, an album simply entitled, Keep On Singing. They continued singing through the valley, and despite the setbacks, they persevered to become the epitome of faithfulness for Southern Gospel music.

(Sidebar: they soon hired Mark Trammell to sing baritone, and later Roger Bennet to play the piano, and with their stable presence remained with the group for the next twenty years. Kirk Talley was also hired and became the cornerstone for Cathedrals' tenor voices; he would be followed by Danny Funderburk and then Ernie Haase. By the time George and Glen retired in 1999, they were the premiere Southern Gospel group in America).

Not all stories end with an encore, but all stories can end with faithfulness (read that line again). It's not always easy to determine God's specific will in the moment, but he does expect a faithful trust. He doesn't guarantee prestige or financial success, but he does ensure his presence. Sometimes we must make difficult decisions, and even give up on dreams, so that we can live out his dreams. Through it all, though, we can keep on singing.

Soli Deo Gloria!
(i.e., only God is glorified!)

Have a wonderful day!
